Overview

Catherine practises in all areas of employment law and personal injury law.

She is on the Attorney-General's Regional A Panel of Junior Counsel and she is regularly instructed to act on behalf of government departments and agencies in cases concerning her areas of expertise.

Catherine has a well-earned reputation for her organisation, her teamwork and her ability to merge sensitivity with strength when instructed.

The fact that Catherine's practice encompasses both employment and personal injury means that she is well placed to advise in cases which require consideration of both areas of law. This includes claims in the County and High Courts involving allegations that the employer has failed to protect the Claimant from suffering psychiatric injury due to stress at work, claims under the Protection from Harassment Act 1997, and Employment Tribunal discrimination claims which involve allegations of personal injury and claims for substantial compensation.

Recommendations

"Catherine is not fazed by huge volumes of evidence or complexities and last minute uncertainties created by claimants' last minute attempts to change the issues and bring in lots of additional evidence. Catherine quickly, calmly and confidently gets to grips with the issues and evidence in the case, works well in preparing witnesses for hearing, and is able to flex her preparation and approach as cases evolve."

“Catherine is extremely thorough and detailed. Her written advice is second-to-none and always clear and well thought out, she is a gritty and smart negotiator, she is excellent on her feet, and she has a broad knowledge on a wide range of topics.”

The Legal 500 2025

“Catherine is responsive, practical and approachable, and her advice is always detailed, sensible and takes into account wider issues. She is an extremely calming and an impressive advocate.”

“Catherine is a well-prepared and thorough advocate who is confident but not aggressive. She is reasonable in her arguments.”
